September 23, 2015 -
Irvine, California is home to Decorative Glass by Livinglass, an environmentally friendly custom glass supplier known for its custom architectural glass designs. The company has been providing decorative wall panels to high-end establishments including The Venetian, Stations Casino, The St. Regis, The Marriott, and The Ritz Carlton, MGM, and Mission Medical Center, among many others for many years.

The company is now offering its new glass designs to builders, architects, and designers. Made from two sheets of glass and a resilient polymer interlayer, Livinglass's products carry both prestige and quality, which can be used in residential and commercial applications. Brett Lee, a spokesperson for Livinglass, explains: "Our goal at Livinglass is to provide a true palette for your creativity," he said. "We want architects and designers with a unique vision to get to know our product better, in order for them to turn their creative vision into reality."

Designers and architects can fully customize decorative glass wall panels according to their choosing. The materials are extensively prepared to give the product the highest level of quality and to prevent any deterioration in the natural products within the glass. A laminating process is used to protect the glass and heat is applied to preserve its 3D form, as well as to maintain the color, texture, and luminosity of the glass. The process does not use PVB lamination which may cause glass to delaminate and whiten, affecting its appearance.

The interlayer materials can be combined in any way imaginable, then given a background color. Clients can then put a textured or a patterned glass design within each glass wall panel to complete the process (examples of previously made designs can be found at www.Livinglass.com). Their architectural decorative glass can be used for a myriad of projects including decorative glass panels, room dividers and office partitions, doors, tables and furniture, safety railings, lighting, barbacks and backsplashes, non-slip flooring on stairs and bathrooms, and on ceilings and countertops.  Their special brand of architectural glass can do it all.

The company continues to provide custom decorative glass for high-end commercial establishments and global brands like Delta Airlines and various luxury resorts around the world. At present, many hospitals and high end hotels and restaurants are acquiring its services to create quality glass walls and decorative glass wall panels. "We continue to push our product forward," said Brett. "Livinglass combines quality with custom design, and that is why we work best with creative designers and architects in high-end hospitality, restaurants, gaming, and entertainment.  We hope our product gives us more opportunities to work together with our clients towards giving them what they want and truly need."

Designers and architecture firms can contact the Livinglass team on their website for information on decorative glass samples for new projects.
