Carson City, Nevada based Home and Garden America, has been curating important gardening content on their website and has reported that a survival food list is a new trend among consumers. The company states that consumers are realizing that a survival food list is crucial in preparing for future disasters.

Home and Garden America has recently released an ammo box filled with a variety of fruit and vegetable seeds that the company says is the ultimate in survival food preparation kits. Building an awareness online, the company has also been posting gardening related articles on their website as well as their many social media pages.

Home and Garden America CEO Chuck Harmon states, "Any survival food list should include heirloom survival seeds." He states that the seed kit includes heirloom seeds, with a relatively high germination rate, and the company offers information regarding how to plant, harvest, store, and then replant seeds to keep this fresh supply of fruits and vegetables coming for many years.

The company's overall goal, according to Chuck Harmon, aside from providing consumers with a survival food list, is to ensure that they have everything they need with regards to natural, whole foods for any survival event.

"We have gained quite a following of heirloom survival seed fans over the course of a few weeks," the CEO states. He goes on to say that the company has provided not only a guide with their product, but informative articles and videos to help consumers as well.

Harmon says that the first step in preparing for any future event is to have a survival list, and a food list is critical. Foods must be chosen for longevity, and foods that can be replanted and grown by survivalists are the best choice, because they allow for long term supply of food. He says that those preparing a food list should consider whether or not the foods on that list can withstand long term use.

More about the seed vault survival kit that Home and Garden America offers, as well as general information about the company and informative articles related to growing a fresh supply of food, can be seen on the company's official website as well as their various social media pages.
